NEW WORK BY RUPERT GRIFFITHS MUSEUM OF DOMESTIC DESIGN & ARCHITECTURE 26 JULY TO 7 SEPTEMBER 2007 separated decisively and absolutely from each other. The 'private' realm of the home came to """. rural subsistence, were crowding into the city) the new rising class of the 'bourgeoisie' moved en masse to the suburbs, family and work have been spiritual core of the individual, of the refuge of everything ened by the 'public' realm of business, politics and industry which the bourgeoisie had created, with its human' and intimate privacy' of the family home became the preserve of the personal, and the ruthless calculation of profit and loss. In contrast to this public realm, the impersonal sanctuary for all that seemed threatdeprived of their traditional means of where the lower classes, increasingly very moment of mass urbanisation industrial revolution, when nome has been an increasingly imporplace and for the negotiation rational, selfhood. and Since (at often of the the from 'exterior' (public), became a powerful metaphor (as well as a refuge) for the self in the individualist and competitive society of the and competitive society of the modern world. The mind had, since at being a self was imagined and experi-enced through metaphors of interior projected on the back wall of the box.

The term camera obscura literall. home, dividing from 'exterior' and exterior architectural space. box with a small aperture or lens in obscura, which was an optical device, ancestor of the simply context, uncertaing finterior? cestor of the photographic that consisted of a darkened as being like the the outside world marks the extent to which which would cause 'dark room'. the space of the century, been (private) to be surfaces, and its materials, is central to the experience of the work. In particular, the black but perfectly mirrored surface of the wall, dividing the room exactly in half, gives a viewer a physical jolt, an uncanny ourselves to be within. The experiwhat part of the moment of the modern domestic interior, to have raised a few of the issues which are at play in Rupert Griffiths's installation at MoDA. of questions about surface and its sense both of being there and also not being there, a strange feeling of in relation to the space around one, its I have hoped, excursion back too, the recognition of oneself both popular and professional discourses on the design of the interior, the built materiality of the interiors themselves, and the lived social experience of these spaces. In town planning guidelines and architects' specification books, and in photographs of real homes, amongst other things — of the development of and the construction 'self' and in a social experience of these spaces. response to his encounter with t nineteenth century to the present day. From Griffiths's research emerged a concern with the relations, as they developed over this period, between tion which explores the experience and the construction of a sense of response to his archive, he has exploring their archives and collec-tions, which constitute a fascinating interior space. Over the last two centuries, the Since the Summer of 2006, Rupert Architecture. domestic and individual identity within Museum of Domestic materials and has been artist in residence in images, books, magaproduced an installainterior from designs, samples started fascinating Design ted by at once the natural product of the soft inside it; but it is also a hard and e 'external' shape which provides the mollusc with its very form and structure. The home, too, is the shaped by the individual to the shaped by the shaped by the shaped by the individual to the shaped by nineteenth century imagined the proper relation between an individual (or family) and their home as being like that which exists between a mollusc and its shell, highlighting the a 'camera obscura') all added up to reinforce a sense of intimacy and to compound the distinction between the private world of the home and the compared the nineteenth-century bourgeois home to a sort of padded instrument case for the individual, which would preserve and protect plush, public world outside it. The Kulturkritik Walter Ben him or her from external influences. the nineteenth interiority popular metaphor

Benjamin

great

flat-pack

press. home was ever-more cheaply available on the market, shown off at exhibitions and advertised in the Watter Deligation became the way that the interior became increasingly a place for the play of the pla projected: a 'phantasmagoria' show of the oriental, exotic, erotic, biomor-phic, gothic and ornamental. This was differentiated product-range accelerated by mass-production and mass-reproducibility. An increasingly became a kind of screen, like the back of a camera obscura, on which a procession of phantasies was surfaces. Increasingly made of pasteboard, a sort of unreal stage scenery, the domestic interior, just like the 'interior' world of dreams, force shaping his or her character.

Walter Benjamin also emphasi the way that the interior beca procession also emphasises for the a dislocation as we the room we feel the inaugural this historical which the dark bourgeois interior had really been this piece of writing – for exan the echoes of the decorative airy writing about the interior is often drained of the home to like a mollusc-shell more were history, nineteenthover.

IDEAL HOMES / ARTIFICIAL HORIZONS this context, the physical space of a home – as such a camera – could be experienced as a sort of 'external' substitute for the 'internal world' of the self. Experienced as such, it and patterning, its darkness (literally world of objects, a carefully preserved zone of reverie, a place for the expression of feeling and fantasy. became a screen for the projection of The soft, tactile, intimate materials of silk), its rich ornamentation century home (velvet, outwards world differently. As with our everyday practices nterior decoration, the concept capture with in the

Introduction by Luke White original

'inside' and 'outside', 'self' and 'other', then perhaps the phenomenology of Maurice Merleau-Ponty, and his idea of a 'flesh of the world' with which we clothe ourselves, and through the mediation of which we which we recognise ourselves, or as a screen onto which we project ourselves; and if the walls of our homes are an ambiguous and permeable inter-face mediating between inside and outside, self and If the surfaces and spaces of our daily existence do provide us with something like a shell, forming us just and deceptive appearances, or are they, as (sur)faces, the 'expression' of what lies 'beneath'? Does a surface separate inside from outside, or does the two. Is a surface something that hides or reveals the interior depths beneath it? Are surfaces 'superficial' ing our private internal universe from the exterior world; or if these spaces and surfaces serve as a mirror in as we form it, separating and protectbetween an inside and an outside, an interior and an exterior. It has an interior decoration, "surface" seems the existence, would be helpful in underfrom one zone to the other? ambiguous role mediating between provide installation. to perceive our own embodied stallation. A surface sit an inside and which marks sort of of permeable the passage of plastics, flat-pack f polystyrene tiles, modular attempt to rework the problem and experience of the self amongst the to be found in the patterning in Griffiths's ceiling. But in his careful choice of materials there is also an styles of living that were taking over, the age of intimate 'dwelling', in was writing about the nineteenth-century home, he could already note surfaces of the domestic interior. By the 1930s, when Walter Benjamin installation to the nineteenth-century past to which I have alluded earlier in patterns of William Morris and the Victorian 'Arts and Crafts' movement There are references in Griffiths's in the minimal, hygienic, light airy but impersonal modernist for example in contemporary

to

them

to Ħ. this self-recognition within programmes of social engineering, and consumpphysical world around us, and how this is altered as we construct this antonyms: space, structure and depth. such spaces, loaded as they are with familiar cultural signifiers, and about social coding of identity also relies on moment for reflection about how the perception of our embodied selves is It also raises is altered as we construct differently. It serves a of these processes self-recognition within our awareness serves as of standing what this piece of work prompts us to experience and think about. advertising, and of television which now so thoroughly mediate our relations with the things we buy and the spaces in which we live, the very generic nature of these products slots of a 'system or within this consumer society, another set of surfaces we may need to set of surfaces we may need to objects' we would be all the more prone to being 'fitted' by those that designed these systems (whether for the goals of social engineering or une stimulation of perpetual consumption) into the pre-ordained slots of a 'system of consumers'. simply for the profit brought about by the stimulation of perpetual above all, that thrown into a self-referential, abstract 'system of surfaces of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries? Is the self itself a less 'system' of differences between them.

All of which begs another question: what is it to find one's identity, desire and sense of selfhood through our increasingly uprooted from reference to anything but the self-referential have been increasingly artificial, in order to be all the more a matter of also haunt this sculpture. In the home, as Jean Baudrillard pointed out in the introduce in trying to understand our relation to the late twentieth-century identikit-style, intimate and interior thing? What is it relation to these impersonal, artificial architectures and forms of design that consumer choices between objects has increasingly become continuous nome are the screens of the media, of produced and standardised units? that chipboard, votes. The texture architecture, cladding, colours, office one's materials and the through retail extend the phantasmagorical 'camera represented on our screens, but the screen finds its way into the heart of the home itself. They open us up to contemporary surfaces, the screen and the interface. Not only are homes with the industries – with The real surfaces of the home have on the one hand see and information technology ies – with those superlatively increasingly entwined, then, e electronic surfaces of the telepresence screen terms. There might, then, be such a thing as a history of surfaces, and MoDA's archive would not be such a bad place to start to look for it... surfaces, and in which identity selfhood can be worked out in the twentieth century has been the age of plastics, flat-pack furniture, the meanings of which they become effectively into screens for the projec-tion of the fantasies and images with altogether less veneers and re of the home individuality, mass-'system spaces, forms MDF and of the relations between the fantasti-cal productions of an 'inner world' and the elusive distant realm of the exotic and never-seen. 'Surface' still mediates, confounds, folds in on itself imagination, for that which we imagine ourselves to be as embodied subjectivities, and its 'surfaces' in particular serve to project these questions of space into the way we imagine our embodied subjectivity. exterior, and all the pairs of terms that line up alongside this one. The built interior in general and the home in particular continue to offer us a model 'container' which stands in, in our imagine The last been an ever-more pressing one. The home has been a primary site for the enmeshment of the self with such any such attachment to surface necesthe constitution of our identities in a 'loss of depth' and a new 'attachment to surfaces'. Rupert Griffiths's instalwhich these questions of what it is to live as a self in a world of surfaces has understand there having been a late-twentieth-century 'turn', which kaleidoscope or maze of fragmentary, impenetrable, depthless surfaces and appearances. What happens to our sense of embodied selfhood, to our obscura' logic that I have discussed above as already at work in the can be thought of as one long era distinction surface' still raises a series of problems of space: of the distinction between an 'inside' and an 'outside', elsewhere. relation longer history than this, and also that the attachment of self to surface has a lation, as well as the history I have involved our relation to the world and commonplace in cultural theory to sense of embodied selfhood, to our 'dwelling' in this age of virtuality? In the 1980s, it became something of a the 1980s, threatens to dissolve the world into a the representational logic of screens kind of a screen and an interface). But suggests, with hindsight, that at son level, the home has always been nineteenth-century been telling here, and yet also causes to be last two hundred and fifty years interfaces also, still pessimistic to still raises between involves suggests 'attachment home (and which es a complex depth' of an commentators, interior according ds in, in which both that

Middlesex University. Luke White is the Lecturer in Visual Culture and History of Art and Design at

An

